What happened in Libya's second largest oil refinery?

Libyan officials say clashes have broken out between armed groups in a western city, trapping residents in their homes and causing fires in the country's second largest oil refinery.

Why did the Libyan oil company declare emergency and force majeure?

The company, which runs Libya's oil industry, declared emergency and force majeure, a legal maneuver that releases it of its contractual obligations because of extraordinary circumstances. In August, clashes between two heavily armed militias in Tripoli killed at least nine people and wounded 16 others.

What triggered Libya's oil-rich clashes?

It wasn't immediately clear what triggered the clashes but they are not uncommon in western Libya, which is controlled by an array of lawless militias and armed groups allied with Prime Minister Abdul Hamid Dbeibah's government. Oil-rich Libya has been divided for years between rival administrations in the east and west.

Oil-rich Libya has been divided for years between rival administrations in the east and west. It plunged into chaos following the 2011 uprising-turned-civil war, which toppled and later killed longtime dictator Moammar Gadhafi. Amid the chaos, militias grew in wealth and power, particularly in Tripoli and the western part of the country.
